

Why gon was better off dead

In my opinion HxH is one of the best shonen i've ever seen thanks to the well written story, power system and specially the characters is what i liked the most in HxH. With one of my favorites being Gon for me gon is one of the best characters i really liked how they manage his personality and goals until the end when this exact same thing became a problem on the chimera ant arc everything was perfect until he had to survive just because the all mighty alluka just a lazy excuse to save gon or something.

My main problem here is how they saved Gon and why they make you feel for him on the whole arc just for him to survive without any real drawbacks. I still remember the first time I watched the scene where Gon finally crashed out emotionally. it felt very special the way i could see gon personalty turn against him by just being egoist and stubborn it reminded me a lot of me when i fight with my brother (my brother being gon) specially the way he just stop caring about everything just to win like a time when we were having a pretty civilized fight until the moment he started to lose he just acted so weird not to say feral but he is gon if killua wasn't around just straight up murder that make me understand gon better somehow because i personally fell more like killua on those situations . I really like when happy characters like Gon go through something similar. They feel more human just like luffy on sabaody.

So after that i was really looking forward to Gon on the chimera ant arc until that episode Gon vs pitou this was one of the best moments on the whole arc When i watched the episode i was really excited to see the conclusion of gon rage the hype was executed perfectly on my opinion and the transformation was super unexpected for me the music and voice acting this being the thing i liked the most plus the music made that whole moment really perfect just gon losing it by saying "I don't care what happens to me now" that is something i feel when things gets to hard i really liked that line because i use it a lot even if its bad for me it made the whole thing connect more to me to something i felt personally. This making the scene one of my favorite moments in the entire arc.

And after all that they just heal him right on the spot like it was nothing the story built up Gon emotional collapse so much just to heal him with the only drawback being having to learn nen again because the thing i felt more connected with was how he treated his problem because when my brother get like that he couldn't fix everything instantly he had to take responsibility and apologize if he feels like it i usually take the blame on everything i can feel myself being his alluka by doing that 's why it bothers me so much probably...

in conclusion that experience made me feel that Gon survival without consequences didn't match the emotional weight he had on the whole arc

Thats why for me Gon might have been better of facing true consequences rather than being saved so effortlessly.